

NAQUITA JACKSON, DNP, MSN, APRN, WHNP-BC
Lieutenant Colonel, USAF (Retired)

Dr. NaQuita Jackson Manning is an Assistant Professor at Florida A&M University School of Nursing. A passion for education, she works diligently to prepare the next generation of registered nurses through theory, clinical instruction, organizational involvement, and leadership. Her area of speciality is women's health, where she serves as course coordinator for the provision of care for women throughout the life span. Additional courses taught are Pharmacology for Nurses, Evidence-Based Practice, and Quality Care, Nursing Transition Practicum, and Promoting the Health of Populations Clinical. She also serves as Secretary for the University's Faculty Senate, Advisor for FAMU Student Nurses' Association, and Liaison for the School of Nursing's Living Learning Community.

Dr. Manning is also a retired Chief Nurse from the United States Air Force, after 22 years of dedicated service. As she transitioned out of the military, it was her sincere desire to continue to be a pivotal contributor to the nursing profession and the community, and nursing education provided that opportunity. She brings with her educational, leadership, and over 26 years of nursing experience, 10 of which were as an Advanced Practice Registered Nurse.

An avid women's health advocate, she is also a Board Certified Women's Health Nurse Practitioner and has a combined work experience of over 20 years in the speciality of Obstetrics and Gynecology. She also served as Deputy Consultant for Women's Health Nurse Practitioners for the United States Air Force. Her research interest is women's health and the impact of cervical cancer surveillance on health outcomes.

Dr. Manning is a member several professional organizations, to include National Association of Nurse Practitioners in Women's Health, American Nurses Association, Florida Nurses Association, and Tallahassee Area Council of Advanced Practice Nurses.
